12576 Nisanth Saravanan

Scenario:

You are a team leader in a project-based environment where transparency has been an issue. Communication breakdowns and a lack of openness have led to misunderstandings, missed deadlines, and low team morale. Your team members have expressed their concerns, and you are determined to implement transparency practices to address these issues.

What kind of assertive communication is encouraged to clarify expectations and roles?

A: Based off of the scenario presented here, the team has deviated from a value that is essential for them to work together.

Now this has lead to a greater issue that is not only affecting their interpersonal relationships, but also their ability to collaborate.

The scenario doesn't go into details as to where it began or where there is a lack of transparency. All it states are the effects of its absence.

If I want to provide clarity on the roles and expectations of the team members, as a team leader, I should have a detailed meeting to address it down to the exact detail. But in doing so, I must remember the fact that the meeting was not to reiterate the problem, but to only discuss solution to it.

- Acknowledge that such a problem exists.
- Bring out the positive outcomes of our past works, and collaborations.
- Reiterate and re-assure the members their roles, and what is expected out of them.
- Make sure all their concerns are addressed, whenever possible.
- Have a consistent check in to see any new concern has risen.

Describe specific communication strategies you will use to foster transparency within your team.

A: If I want transparency within my team, it fundamentally comes down to my observation skills.

It doesn't matter if you verbally express something, the actions always give away. It is my responsibility to see if there are any signs of conflict or lack of transparency among the team members.

Secondly, a regular check in meeting, just to share feedback about each other's work. If the team is not comfortable, we can use anonymously.

Identify and remove prejudice.

Ensure the team upholds at most confidentiality to the internal affairs of the team.

How do you establish effective feedback mechanisms by using “I” statements?

A: “I” Statements are often the most challenging statements to use. The reason being that it directly puts you in the line of fire as the protagonist of the feedback.

We need to set up a stage where there is no judgement for someone to even considering using “I” Statements.

“I” statements can not only used for admittance to something, but also to step up and volunteer, whether it may be to share an opinion or an idea. This requires the team to be open to other perspectives, open to let others try, open to feedback and criticism.

It can also point out and criticise someone in a constructive manner by expressing their belief and their opinion of the other person’s actions. This in itself helps deliver a feedback that is not intended to offend or come off as too harsh on the other person.
